It would have been very surprising, indeed, if, under such circumstances, the general stock market failed to advance; and advance it did with a rapidity that in some cases appeared to be as sensational as did the appeared to be as sensational as did the appeared to be as sensational as did the recent decline. Thought must be taken, however, of the Jong continued and altogether extreme depression in the market recently and of the great quantity of stock that in the course of the fall passed into investors' hands. It is always observable upon such occasions that the recovery in the market when it sets in runs very much farther than the melority of very much farther than the majority of observers thought likely at the outset of the movement. Even at the final quota-tions of last Saturday the market had not recovered half of its decline since the be-ginning of the year; and it could still be said, as it was in this column a week ago, that prices of the standard railway and industrial shares were ridiculously
